Along with a huge number of losses of human lives and concomitant miseries, the on-going global pandemic as a result of novel Coronavirus (COVID-19) is creating havoc in all walks of life. Economic, social and political life across the world has got disrupted and is expected to unfold further in the coming weeks, months and may be years.

It is having and will have serious ramifications across various sectors, international trade being a major one of them. Pharmaceuticals including medical equipment and food sectors are facing some major challenges. Not because that they are not available enough but their access is becoming more and more challenging including on account of export restrictions.

Unless they are addressed in a balanced manner by taking into account all interests, such measures and counter-measures may spiral into a slippery slope of protectionism resulting in spill-over effects from supply to demand-side shocks.

As a result, other than immediate consequences such as loss of producer and consumer welfare, there will be a serious damage to the system of multilateralism, which has underwritten the security, peace and prosperity of the world since the Second World War. Can the humanity afford it to happen?

Therefore, other than debating this broader role of the WTO in underwriting peace, security, stability and prosperity, this Webinar will discuss the following specific suggestions for trade multilateralism under the aegis of the WTO to reinvest itself in a new avatar:

- Support for the Multi-party Interim Appeal Arbitration Arrangement for settling trade disputes
- Revival of the built-in agenda of the existing WTO agreements by advocating for greater transparency in the functioning of the WTO's Committees
- Absorption of the values of the WTO Agreement on Trade Facilitation for future multilateral negotiations
